Biography

Henry A. Murray (1893-1988) American psychologist and Harvard professor, was a pioneer in the development of personality theory.

Henry Alexander Murray was born in New York City on May 13, 1893 and died in Cambridge, Massachusetts on June 23, 1988. He was educated at Groton and Harvard College where he concentrated in history and graduated in 1915. He married Josephine Rantoul of Boston in 1916. She joined him in New York where he completed his M.A. in biology and M.D. at Columbia Medical School. Murray received his Ph.D. in biochemistry from Cambridge University in 1927 and accepted an assistantship to Morton Prince at the Harvard Psychological Clinic. Murray became interested in psychology through reading Carl G. Jung's Psychological Types in 1923 and meeting Jung for three weeks in Switzerland in 1925. His interest was spurred on by his acquaintance with Christiana Drummond Morgan, an artist who shared his fascination with Jung, the unconscious and the writings of Herman Melville. This passionate relationship continued in balance with his marriage throughout his life. With the help of Morgan, Murray developed the Thematic Apperception Test (TAT) in 1935, which could be used to assess an individual's personality and self-understanding. The TAT was published and distributed by the Harvard University Press in 1943.

At the Harvard Psychological Clinic Murray learned to practice psychoanalysis under the supervision of Hanns Sachs. He headed up a research program which published Explorations in Personality, (Murray ed., et. al.), 1938. In 1938 he was asked by the U.S. Government to put together a psychological profile on Adolph Hitler. During the second World War he served the U.S. Army by helping the forerunner of the CIA assess the psychological fitness of its agents. Murray became a tenured lecturer at Harvard in 1947 and Professor of Clinical Psychology in 1951. Murray was a central figure in the interdisciplinary Department of Social Relations, retiring from Harvard in 1962, six months after his wife's death. Murray's energy continued as he kept up his research and married Caroline "Nina" Fish, Co-Director of the Psycho-educational Clinic at Boston University's School of Education.

Murray's main interest included personology, Melville and the welfare of the world in the atomic age. In his Basic Concepts for a Psychology of Personality, (Journal of Psychology, 15, 1936), he described personology as "the disciplined study of human nature." This included studying individual memory, thought and action and their development over time, studying the integration of a person's inner outer life, their likes, dislikes, feelings and fears, and categorizing elements which contribute to an enduring life-long disposition, both professional and vocational. Murray published several articles on Melville's life and works and drafted a biography of Melville. He was considered by the Melville Society to be one of the scholars to bring about the Melville revival in the 1920's. His connection with the Society continued into his final years. The dawning of the atomic age concerned Murray, who considered the world to be in a state of "global neurosis." He argued for a democratic world government and a radical conversion of personalities so that the world be a safer place to live. He hoped that a synthesis of universal myths, truths and wisdom could turn the situation around.

Henry A. Murray was a renegade in his field in that, despite his extensive medical and scientific background, he maintained a disdain for scientism in psychology. He saw the study of personality as the study of human lives. He was a charismatic character who attracted many followers, both students and colleagues. A biography has been written by Forrest G. Robinson entitled Love's Story Told: A Life of Henry A. Murray.

Correspondence

Alphabetical, 1910-1986, 1910-1986

Identifier: HUGFP 97.6

Date: 1910-1986

Physical Description: 25 boxes

Scope And Contents: Contains correspondence arranged by the personal name of the correspondent (this includes some classification by first name, when no last name was available), and then by the date. The correspondence includes letters, postcards and telegrams, primarily from others to Murray, but some copies of letters written by Murray are interspersed throughout the series.

Some early correspondence relates to Murray's experience with the 1917 draft, and his entrance to medical school. Later correspondence relates to arrangement of meetings and conferences, discussion of writings in progress , and request for recommendations from Murray. Some later correspondence also relates to Murray's involvement with World War II military and his interest in the Melville Society.

Memory Study, undated

Identifier: HUGFP 97.45.10

Physical Description: 2 boxes

Scope And Contents: Contains results of two separate experiments on individuals' memory relating to spoken questions. The first records the oral responses of 46 participants to 16 questions. Their responses were taped and then transcribed.

The second appears to have been a different set of 13 questions, to which 47 participants were asked to respond in writing. They seem to have written what they remembered about the question and then their own personal response. A list of names of the participants is provided for the second experiment. Typed copies of their handwritten responses are also included.
